VIRGINIA'S CONVERSION FOUNDATIONS – REPORT TO THE JOINT COMMISSION ON HEALTH CARE

2005 EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

During its 1998 Session, the Virginia General Assembly passed House Joint Resolution (HJR) 179, requesting conversion foundations to annually update the Joint Commission on Health Care on their charitable activities. In response, the Virginia Consortium for Health Philanthropy is submitting its 2005 Report to the Joint Commission on Health Care, which outlines the activities of Virginia's 12 conversion foundations throughout the year.

- Virginia's 12 conversion health foundations are the Alleghany Foundation, the Bedford Community Health Foundation, Inc., the Bernardine Franciscan Sisters Foundation, Inc., the Cameron Foundation, the Franklin Southampton Charities, the Greenville Memorial Foundation, the Harvest Foundation, the Jenkins Foundation, the John Randolph Foundation, the Portsmouth General Hospital Foundation, the Williamsburg Community Health Foundation, and the Wythe-Bland Community Foundation.
- A number of Virginia Foundations which also support health related services, but were not the result of a conversion, play an important role in funding health-related activities. Among these are the Campbell-Hoffman Foundation, the Carilion Foundation, the Centra Health Foundation, the Mary Washington Hospital Foundation, the Medical Society of Virginia Foundation, the Peninsula Community Foundation of Virginia, the Richmond Memorial Health Foundation, the Riverside Health System Foundation, the Sentara Health Foundation and the Virginia Health Care Foundation. These organizations have joined with the conversion foundations to form the Virginia Consortium of Health Philanthropy to better coordinate their funding efforts.
- These foundations together held more than $704 million in assets in 2005, which is a 12.6% increase over 2004; and represent total annual grantmaking of $22.8 million.
- Virginia's conversion foundations represent an important resource in Virginia for addressing pressing health issues at the local level.
- All of the conversion foundations have specific geographic areas that they serve. Combined, the service areas encompass Tidewater, Central Virginia, and parts of Western Virginia and cover about twenty-five percent of Virginia's cities and counties.
- NEW: Most notably, and perhaps tellingly, a sizeable majority of the grants awarded in 2005 were targeted to health promotion and disease prevention. This could be attributed to several factors: an increase in the number of individuals with chronic conditions, such as high blood pressure, diabetes and heart disease; an increase in the number of individuals with more than one chronic condition; and increased recognition of the seriousness of these illnesses coupled with the need to try a different approach.

- Increasing access to health care for low-income, uninsured Virginians continues to be high on the list of Foundations' priorities. Many grant recipient organizations dealing with chronic disease are considered vital "safety net" providers, such as free clinics, community health centers, and other community-based, non-profit organizations, the majority of whom serve this population.
- NEW: Another shift worth noting is that funding for substance abuse treatment and prevention has decreased substantially from 2004 levels, although there are no indicators that the need for such funding has declined. Infrastructure development grants have also decreased noticeably.
- There are opportunities for collaboration between the conversion foundations and the Commonwealth which could be coordinated to have a greater impact on improving health and increasing access to health care services for Virginians. Those possibilities are as follows:
 1. Coordinated efforts to collect and report information on community health status and service needs.
 Beginning in 2003, a number of conversion foundations (as members of the Consortium for Health Philanthropy) committed three years of start-up funding to support the Virginia Atlas for Community Health, a web-based application that integrates data from a number of existing publicly and privately developed data resources into an easy-to-use database. The purpose of this project is to impact community health improvement projects across the Commonwealth. The Virginia Atlas is available to the public online at www.vahealthycommunities.com. This is an important effort which a number of the conversion foundations continue to fund beyond 2005.
 2. Sharing information on local health programs in order to avoid duplication of effort.
 3. Sharing information on new state health initiatives that may have a direct impact on local health care delivery systems.
- The conversion foundations are making a significant contribution to improving the health status of the residents of the communities they serve. They are dedicated to strengthening the existing community-based non-profits as well as helping to establish new organizations that are critical to addressing some of the most pressing health needs in the state. There is tremendous long-term potential for these foundations to assist in bringing lasting and positive change to the health of Virginia's residents.

I. INTRODUCTION

During its 1998 Session, the Virginia General Assembly passed House Joint Resolution (HJR) 179. This resolution requests that foundations formed in Virginia as a result of hospitals converting from not-for-profit to for-profit status annually update the Joint Commission on Health Care on their charitable activities. Foundations that were formed as a result of Hospitals that sold their assets to other not-for-profit health systems are included in this report as well. These organizations, commonly called “conversion health foundations” were asked to provide information on:

1. The total dollar value expended on charitable activities;
2. The health care programs and other projects funded during the year;
3. The type of indigent and uninsured populations served; and
4. The ways in which the activities of the foundations and the Commonwealth could be coordinated to have a greater impact on providing care to the indigent and reducing the number of uninsured persons.

House Joint Resolution 179 also directed the Joint Commission on Health Care to involve the foundations in its ongoing planning and assessment of initiatives and other actions to address the problems of the Commonwealth’s indigent and uninsured populations.

In response to this resolution, the Virginia Consortium for Health Philanthropy, an informal association of health foundations, is pleased to submit its 9th annual report to the Joint Commission on Health Care. It provides an overview of the foundations’ 2005 activities and illustrates the contribution these organizations are making to improve the lives of residents in many regions throughout Virginia.

II. OVERVIEW OF VIRGINIA’S CONVERSION HEALTH FOUNDATIONS

Virginia is the home of 12 conversion health foundations: the Alleghany Foundation, the Bedford Community Health Foundation, Inc., the Bernardine Franciscan Sisters Foundation, Inc., the Cameron Foundation, Franklin-Southampton Charities, the Greensville Memorial Foundation, The Harvest Foundation, the Jenkins Foundation, the John Randolph Foundation, the Portsmouth General Hospital Foundation, the Williamsburg Community Health Foundation, and the Wythe-Bland Community Foundation. These foundations together held over $704 million in assets in 2005 and represent total annual grantmaking of $22,847,113.

Clearly, Virginia’s conversion foundations are a critical resource in addressing pressing community needs and have great potential to make long-term and positive impact in their local jurisdictions. These 12 foundations are as diverse as the regions of the state they represent. Their missions were developed in response to the unique needs of the communities they serve. As such, several foundations have established broad funding categories to encompass the multitude of issues confronted by their communities. Others have devoted their assets specifically to health funding. All, however, have a significant focus on improving the health and well being of the residents of their local communities.

Given the process by which the conversion foundations were created, each has adopted a local perspective. In this way, they continue the charitable mission and service area of the entity from which they were created. A defined service area also enables the foundations to increase the impact they are able to have. As shown in Exhibit 1, the foundations and their service areas include Tidewater, Central Virginia and parts of Western Virginia. In combination, the foundations cover about twenty-five percent of Virginia's cities and counties. It is important to note that while the foundations can make a meaningful contribution to the communities they serve, their geographic sphere of influence is limited.

A summary of each foundation is provided on the following pages, which includes its mission, service area, asset size and 2005 grantmaking activities. These summaries illustrate the diversity represented by the conversion foundations.

III. FOUNDATION ACTIVITIES TO IMPROVE HEALTH STATUS IN VIRGINIA

In 2005, Virginia’s conversion health foundations expended a total of $22.8 million on charitable activities. Of this, over $16.9 million was targeted to programs and activities to improve the health and well being of residents. Exhibit 3 provides a list of each foundation and the corresponding total 2005 grant awards targeted to health and human service funding. A detailed listing of 2005 grant awards, which includes the grantee organization and funded project, can be found in the Appendix.

All of the conversion foundations had their genesis in a not-for-profit hospital. Accordingly, they have all targeted a substantial portion of their grantmaking to supporting health and human service-related activities. The foundations have provided an important and often crucial influx of resources to community-based non-profit organizations throughout the regions covered by the foundations. In so doing, they have become a key force in addressing some of the most complex and multi-faceted health issues facing Virginia's residents. These areas include, but are not limited to, access to health care services, health promotion and disease prevention, adolescent pregnancy prevention, health professions education and recruitment, healthcare services infrastructure, development, mental health services, research, services and support for the elderly, and substance abuse services. Exhibit 3 illustrates the foundations' total 2005 health and human service related grantmaking by issue area.

In previous years, a higher percent of resources were geared toward human services, but that focus shifted in 2005. Most notably, and perhaps tellingly, a sizeable majority of the grants awarded were targeted to health promotion and disease prevention. This may be attributed to several factors: an increase in the number of individuals with chronic conditions, such as high blood pressure, diabetes and heart disease; an increase in the number of individuals with more than one chronic condition; and increased recognition of the seriousness of these illnesses coupled with the need to try a different approach.

Such a shift in grant proposals and funding indicates an overall recognition that more than a band-aid cure is needed to counteract the skyrocketing number of Virginians (and Americans in general) with chronic illness. It is also indicative of the reality of increasing costs associated with managing and treating chronic disease, especially for those individuals dealing with multiple diagnoses. Increased costs are a burden for anyone, but especially so for the under- and uninsured individuals within our communities. Given these factors, service providers have begun tackling these issues at their core with education and prevention strategies.

Increasing access to health care for low-income, uninsured Virginians continues to be high on the list of Foundations' priorities. While serving the uninsured with special needs is a vital component of the conversion foundations' missions, it is clear that is not the exclusive focus. The resources under each foundation's stewardship came from the community it serves, and it is appropriate for the foundation to strive to serve the community as a whole, as opposed to a segment of the population.

Another shift worth noting is that funding for substance abuse treatment and prevention has decreased substantially from 2004 levels, although there are no indicators that the need for such funding has declined. Infrastructure development grants have also decreased noticeably.

IV. OPPORTUNITIES FOR COLLABORATION

- Virginia's conversion foundations represent an important resource in Virginia for addressing pressing health issues at the local level. There are opportunities for collaboration between the conversion foundations and the Commonwealth which could be coordinated to have a greater impact on improving health and increasing access to health care services for Virginians. In looking at these collaborative efforts, it is important to remember that the conversion foundations are focused on addressing gaps in local health systems, as well as enhancing existing health services. They do not intend to assume or finance in any way the core functions of government programs.

1. Coordination of efforts to collect and report information on community health status and service needs

It is vital for both the conversion health foundations and the Commonwealth to have an accurate understanding of the health status and service needs of local regions. At the state level, the Virginia Department of Health, the Department of Mental Health, Mental Retardation, and Substance Abuse Services, the Department of Youth and Family Services, the Department of the Aging, and other agencies collect information on local health status and service needs. Local health departments, Community Services Boards, and other local agencies often attempt to supplement data available from the state on an as-needed basis. The conversion health foundations also have a need for this data, and several have undertaken special needs assessment studies to support their own planning efforts.

In 2003, the Consortium on Health Philanthropy (which includes many of Virginia's conversion foundations) partnered with the Virginia Center for Healthy Communities to support the Virginia Atlas of Community Health, a web-based application designed to impact community health improvement projects across the Commonwealth. The Virginia Atlas integrates data from a number of existing publicly and privately developed data resources into an easy-to-use database. It is available online at www.vahealthycommunities.com. The Consortium of Health Philanthropy provided operating costs for three years, which included updating and expanding the data on the site and making it easier to use. This is an important effort that many of the foundations continue to fund beyond the initial start-up period.

Currently the Virginia Atlas of Community Health is free of charge for users. The Atlas makes health data available which helps localities assess areas of community need, pinpoint neighborhoods in greatest need of intervention, and provides organizations with consistent and up-to-date information on which to base continuing and future programming decisions.

2. Share information on local health programs to avoid duplication of effort

The conversion health foundations often receive requests to fund projects involving public agencies such as local health departments and community services boards. In evaluating these requests it is important for the foundations to know how local health programs are organized, financed, and administered so that foundation funding can be targeted to those programs in greatest need. At the same time, it is important for state and local public agencies to be aware of foundation-supported projects and other private sector projects so that public funds may be effectively targeted. When one local funding source is not aware of the activities of another, there is a risk of unnecessary duplication and overlap in program funding.

A number of Virginia Foundations which also support health related services, but were not the result of a conversion, play an important role in funding health-related activities. Among these are the Campbell-Hoffman Foundation, the Carilion Foundation, the Centra Health Foundation, the Mary Washington Hospital Foundation, the Medical Society of Virginia Foundation, the Peninsula Community Foundation of Virginia, the Richmond Memorial Health Foundation, the Riverside Health System Foundation, the Sentara Health Foundation and the Virginia Health Care Foundation. These organizations have joined with the conversion foundations to form the Virginia Consortium of Health Philanthropy to better coordinate their funding efforts. (See the Appendix for a listing of the Consortium's membership).

These foundations and public agencies can help each other by sharing basic information on the health programs they support. Such information might include the purpose of the program, the geographic region it serves, the types of services it delivers, the number of clients it serves, and the program budget. To the extent that accurate information is shared, both the foundations and the public agencies will be better able to avoid unnecessary duplication and target their resources toward unmet needs.

3. Share information on new state health initiatives that may have a direct impact on local health care delivery systems

If it is important to share information on existing programs, it is equally critical to share information on new state health initiatives. Some state health initiatives have potentially major implications for local regions and the conversion health foundations. As the foundations plan their grant support programs, they must consider the local impact of:

- The continued effort to increase enrollment for Virginia's Family Access to Medical Insurance Security Plan (FAMIS);
- Medicaid managed care;
- Reform of the local systems for mental health, mental retardation, and substance abuse services; and
- Potential changes in the role of local health departments in health care delivery

In this context, it is crucial for the conversion health foundations to be informed about new state health initiatives. At the same time, it is important for the foundations to keep public officials informed of foundation activities as they relate to key state initiatives. At a minimum, this type of coordination can help to ensure the foundations and the public agencies make informed decisions about future policies and programs.

The conversion foundations are eager to continue effective collaborative efforts as well as to explore new opportunities for collaboration. The Consortium welcomes ongoing dialogue with the Joint Commission on Health Care to accomplish this mission.

V. CONCLUSION

Virginia conversion foundations are dedicated to strengthening existing community-based non-profits and helping to establish new organizations that are critical to addressing some of the most pressing health care needs in the state. With the resources available to them, the foundations have much to offer - individually, collectively, and in partnership with the State - towards improving the health status of many of Virginia's communities. The foundations welcome and anticipate even higher levels of involvement in the ongoing planning, assessment and improvement of Virginia's health initiatives.
